The Airedale Heritage

The Airedale was developed as a hunting dog for sport and utility by practical farmers of Yorkshire, England. They crossed local hunting terriers to larger non-terriers, including Otterhounds, to get a keen dog to hunt vermin, water rats, and rabbits. The increased size, speed and scenting ability of early Airedales gave them added versatility to retrieve waterfowl and flush game birds.

Coming to America in the early 1900's, the Airedale grew his reputation by hunting big and dangerous game. Quickly the Airedale's legendary courage and ability drafted him into service as a police and army dog.

By 1920 the Airedale was the most popular breed in the US. Though that popularity waned, the Airedale still enjoys a loyal following among terrier fanciers and sportsmen.

The Airedale Personality

Tenacity. Athleticism. Nose. Strength and courage. All those qualities from the Airedale's heritage remain in today's Airedale.

But add to that the breed's distinguishing quality -- a sense of humor that can prompt anything-for-a-laugh antics -- and see what sets it apart from other breeds. Add intelligence, loyalty, an endearing bearded face, a hunter's heart, and a guard dog's spirit, and you have a breed with many advantages.

The Hunting Airedale

"I didn't know those dogs could hunt" is a comment often heard by Airedale owners when they take their dogs to the field. Typically, the well-trained Airedale earns the respect of those who watch him bring in his birds.

Many old-time hunters will recall hunting with an Airedale in their youth, most often a do-everything farm dog. Over time, demographics and lifestyles have changed. Hunting trends favor the more specialized spaniels, retrievers or pointers. However, a comment made by William H. Miller in his book American Hunting Dogs in 1926 holds true today: "He [the Airedale] is the greatest of all terriers, and the one who can and is being successfully trained to hunt everything alive that can be hunted."

Add that hunting versatility to all the attributes of a multi-faceted personality, and you have an exceptional breed.
